What's new:

: Bed, Bath and Beyond, USA, April 28, 2015 Just for fun, an entry in our Best of 2013 reader inspired by the theme Dinner for One. My husband doesn't cook, but if he did, I'm sure he'd tinker around a bit and eventually emerge with something amazing. I'd serve him any number of things; flatbread, a cheese-stuffed salad, smoked salmon, an egg and avocado sandwich, a soft scrambled egg with spiced mushrooms and perhaps a good piece of English muffin bread topped with leftover baked beans if they'd been in the fridge. But all these things, even if I offered them to him, have little or no appeal without the first course to accompany them. And so when I realize that I don't actually love most of the things I make, I start out with those things that are obvious crowd-pleasers — I make stuff I know he'll like. This goes double for when I know he'll prefer grilled fish to an appetizer, and I combine that and an easy-breezy recipe for grilled prawns, a creamy potato salad, red and green bell peppers, and more because they'll all be on one plate, and that's usually what he wants most in life. I haven't always made things that seem like they have to be perfect for him to eat, however. I've always been a simple cook, and I sought out every single online recipe that people I've admired over the years shared. One of the most treasured, and the one I used many, many times as a venue for impromptu dinner for one with my husband was this recipe from Lisa a while back for a quick chicken stir-fry, or for family nights when she served it with rice. This is, by anyone's measure, a simple recipe with very few ingredients, and this was its advantage, too. I've used this my whole life. It has left the house over the years, and if he hasn't eaten it, I'm confident he will. I'm the same with the pork and bean soup I blogged about last year, or the quinoa casserole that my mother-in-law always made. In truth, I've been so confident in this recipe over many years that it
