"Galactic Ruler is a small but very addictive game where you are not just a simple worker bee working for the queen. You are her empire builder, constructing the different planets and stars, filling them with resources and organizing space fleets, building a collection of warships, and ultimately, finding a way to defeat her enemies by sending your own fleets against them." Knilheim: Spatzle - I hate that goddamn whining cow. Gamma-Daddy: I bought an Intergalactic Empire game today, it's like an old fashion C64 type game but with new graphics. I like that it has huge amount of planets, something like 5GB of data with only 20K of ram is getting me worried. If a phone game can do this how is the pc still far away? Sawtyhug: In this game you are the computer's (monarch) personal assistant. As in all assignments you need to click, click and click. Xabrine: "Galactic Ruler is a small but very addictive game where you are not just a simple worker bee working for the queen. fleets, building a collection of warships, and ultimately, finding a way to defeat her enemies by sending your own fleets against them."It is also available for purchase on Steam. Please try it out and don't forget to rate and review. It's definitely a game that will challenge your hand-eye coordination, something I needed after playing Retro City Rampage for a couple of hours. So far there are over 100 planets, with more added every few months. There are also 36 types of asteroids and 4 types of moons. Each planet has a unique starting position, layout, resources, and balance. The planets are very easy to get around and send your ships to explore the moons and asteroids. There are resources like Uranium and Phosphorus to build ships, weapons, or defenses. You have to be aware of the size of the planet when sending a ship. You can never send a ship more than 10x10x10 metres to a planet. With each upgrade you can move the ship a little further, but not too far or your ship may be destroyed. There is also a toggleable radar so you can see which planets and what are near them. You can change your settings, such as your captain's name, so you don't have to re-type
