The crystal structure of the substrate-induced homohexameric formate dehydrogenase from Leptospira biflexa (LFDH), a formate dehydrogenase from a micro-organism, has been determined at 1.85 Å resolution. The structure of the monomer in the dimer assembly showed it to be similar to that of the formate dehydrogenase from Escherichia coli (EcFDH). The homohexamer was formed by the electron transfer via the quinone cofactor and was stabilized by ionic interactions between the substrate and K(+) ions and by hydrogen bonds within the dimers. In addition, hydrogen bonding of a water molecule to the inter-subunit carboxylate moiety of the catalytic cofactor, NADP(+), and to the side chain of the W426, a catalytically essential residue, was also observed. This observation is consistent with the catalytic roles of the amino acids.Get breaking news alerts and special reports. The news and stories that matter, delivered weekday mornings.
